Saying Little, Speaking Volumes

August 28, 2026 -- Even after 100 days in office, little has been revealed about how Fed Chair Kevin Warsh feels about the stance of monetary policy and the economic conditions he inherited. We have come to learn that he isn't a proponent of providing "forward guidance", where the Fed reveals its hand regarding near-term policy expectations. However, we haven't learned much about his so-called "reaction function" or expected policy response when presented with a given set of economic conditions.

As far as forward guidance goes, Mr. Warsh said "Forward guidance [...] was adopted by my colleagues and me during the Global Financial Crisis. It was essential at the time [...] but, as with other legacies of crises past, I believe that the practice has overstayed its welcome. In normal times, the role of forward guidance should be limited and circumscribed." Later, he added "I'm not alone in noticing that forward guidance in 2021, to cite one example, might well have slowed the policy response to high inflation."

Mr. Warsh apparently believes in providing forward guidance when warranted, but not as a regular or routine communication tool. In his speech, he expressed concerns that setting market expectations can lead to policy errors, as they recently may have.

The National Activity Index from the Federal Reserve Bank of Chicago suggests that the economy ran at a sub-optimal level in July. Using an equilibrium rate of zero, the NAI seeks to show if the economy is growing above or below its "potential", or ability to grow without throwing off imbalances like inflation. While "potential" is a moving target, it's reckoned to be a GDP rate of perhaps as high as 2.4% but possibly as low as 1.8%. The NAI's -0.08 mark for July says growth was slightly below potential, and if potential is currently closer to the high end of the range, perhaps the FRB/NY's Nowcast is close to the mark on growth at pre-

Personal incomes rose by 0.4% in July. Income growth was lifted by a 0.3% increase in wages, but also bolstered by a 0.5% rise in proprietor incomes, a gain of 0.3% in rental property receipts, a half-point gain in investment returns and another sizable (+0.8%) increase in government transfer payments for medicare, medicaid social security and such. While incomes were up for the month, spending was not, as real personal consumption expenditures were unchanged. Less outgo than income meant more available for the piggy bank, and the national rate of savings improved by 0.4% to an improved (though still weak) 3% rate.

As might be expected, sales of new homes were soggy in July. The Census Bureau reported that sales of newly-constructed residences managed just a 607,000 annual rate of sale. This was a 10.5% deterioration from an upwardly-revised June figure, where 50,000 units were added to the initial estimate, lifting the total for June to 678,000. Supplies of new homes for sale remain more than ample; soft sales saw the inventory-to-sales ratio reballoon to 9.6 months of supply at the present rate of sale; optimal supply is considered to be perhaps six months. If there's any positive in the report, it may be that new homes sold were less expensive; at $393,800, it is the lowest cost for a new home in five years, so there may be relative bargains available.

Mortgage rates hovering around one-year highs? Check. Applications for mortgage credit posting declines? Also check. According to the Mortgage Bankers Association, requests for mortgages declined by 1% in the week ending August 21. Applications for funds to purchase homes declined by 0.3%; those for loans to refinance existing mortgages dropped off by a full 2%. Mortgage rate conditions simply aren't supportive of any increase in activity at the moment, and this may be the case for a time yet.
